Key takeaways from investor meetings in KL

- Kuala Lumpur investors' sentiment upbeat, looking to add at right time
- Key debates include the breadth of HK rally and the outlook for cloud vs. AI phones/PCs
- Large-cap internet companies are consensus holdings, while consumption is of interest for potential rotation or additions

What's New Last week, our tech hardware analyst, Jim Au, and I met with clients based in Malaysia. We observed that investor interest in HK stocks was much stronger compared to our last trip in Oct 2024. Discussions centered on the breadth of the rally, AI companies' growth prospects, and key industry debates surrounding the sub-segments of tech industry, as many investors are looking for opportunities to add at a right time.

Most investors are currently holding on to large-cap internet companies but are keen to explore valuation upside in selected tech names and potential opportunities in laggards. Below are our responses to some of the key questions raised during the trip:

Is the recent Al-driven rally likely to extend to other sectors, like consumption?

Our base case remains that this is primarily a tech-driven rally. While we expect there to be flows chasing lagging sectors like consumption and property in anticipation of further policy supports during the Two Sessions, we believe these are still tactical trades rather than a structural shift.

We need more compelling evidence that addresses China's deep-rooted economic challenges. It's encouraging that the official Purchasing Managers Index (PMI) returned to 50.2 in February post the Chinese New Year, but this was mainly driven by large corporates, as the small and medium enterprise (SME) PMI further contracted. Deflationary pressure persists, with the subindex of output prices at 48.5 in Feb, still in contraction. People's Bank of China (PBOC) Policy Committee member Wang Yiming also warned that Consumer Price Index (CPI) y/y growth will likely to slow in February due to lack of demand.

Meanwhile, we believe the consumption outlook is still closely tied to household sentiment on asset prices – especially property – and the job market. February property sales fell 4% m/m, despite a low base, and the 100 Cities Secondary Price Index remains in the red. Labour market conditions remain challenging: The Manufacturing PMI employment sub-index improved slightly to 48.6 in Feb (from 48.1 in Jan) but remains in contraction, and the non-manufacturing PMI employment sub-index declined to 46.5 in Feb (from 46.7 in Jan), due to the drag in construction sector.

Have long-term investors returned?

Based on EPFR data, active investors resumed net selling of China stocks in the week of 26 Feb. Since 13 Jan, foreign mutual fund investors net bought USD432 mn China stocks, mainly because of USD2.5 bn passive inflows. Active funds recorded net outflow of USD2.0 bn in the same period.

Will the upcoming Two Sessions trigger profit-taking?

In fact some profit taking has happened since 28 Feb, when US President Donald Trump threatened to impose another 10% of tariff on China exports. As discussed in an earlier report, we believe the Two Sessions is unlikely to bring any major positive surprises, as the tone was largely set during the Central Economic Work Conference (CEWC) in December.

If AI PC/smartphones increasingly run LLMs on the edge, will it cannibalise the growth prospects of cloud computing?

LLMs running on edge devices would need to be downsized, reducing parameters and inevitably sacrificing both accuracy and predictive power. While edge AI models offer privacy advantages, they still lag cloudbased models in performance due to the absence of hyperscale AI processing with GPU clusters.

Despite the rising adoption of edge AI computing and AIenabled devices, the demand for AI cloud services is expected to continue growing, driven by broader and more sophisticated AI applications that require higher computational power for AI advancements, as long as AI adoption continues to expand. As such, while edge AI excels in specific use cases, its current limitations mean it's unlikely to fully replace cloud computing; rather, a coexistence of both is more probable. Given the significant risk of US chip restrictions on Chinese brands, how do Chinese AI beneficiaries' growth prospects and valuations compare to their US peers? The risk of US chip restrictions has largely been priced in after five years of US-imposed tech bans, and the market has low expectations of a resolution to US-China tensions.

Meanwhile, skyrocketing local demand from new energy vehicles (NEVs) and industrial applications, further fuelled by the emergence of DeepSeek, continues to accelerate chip localisation and advanced manufacturing in China. Since the initial ban, China's AI sector's valuation has recovered. We expect further semiconductor localisation efforts and improved sentiment, spurred by additional US restrictions, to drive a continued re-rating of related stocks.

China's goal of 80% integrated circuit (IC) self-sufficiency by 2030 will continue to attract government and private capital into its emerging AI value chain, reinforcing domestic semiconductor growth as a structural driver of the sector.
